One of the areas we frequently find is not adequately addressed is the field of Backups. All too many companies will develop and implement a comprehensive backup strategy when a new server is installed, however, as time moves onward changes are often made to where data is stored, something that does not get replicated to backup process.

Of course, in the event of a system failure, the required data is nowhere to be found on the tape. This will, naturally, have a massive impact on the organisations ability to recover. If there is a mantra which you should consider, its Review, Amend and Test at regular frequencies.

One thing worthy of consideration is archiving critical data to an external resource.

As the speed of internet connections improve, and of course throughout the night your connection is virtually inactive, the option of creating additional copies of your data at a secure site is an attractive proposition.
